- A What do scientists say about discovering a liar
- B Spotting a liar is easy
- C Body language and stress
- D Avoiding eye contact

People tend to think they are better at something than they really are. That is also true of our lie detection skills – the ability to guess if someone is lying.

3.1
 There are many myths about detecting lies, for example, people often believe that a liar does not look you straight in the eye. This is not necessarily true; not looking at someone may just mean that someone simply feels uncomfortable or embarrassed, and that's something that often happens in difficult situations.

3.2
 Another myth is that a liar covers his or her mouth while speaking to you. However, covering one's mouth often means that someone is feeling stressed or uncomfortable, not necessarily that they are lying. On the other hand, it's fair to say that a situation in which you feel you have to lie is stressful and uncomfortable. So, how much truth is there in all these myths?

3.3
 Research on lie detection suggests that the average person has about 54% chance of catching out a liar, unless you are Cal Lightman, the main character in the series 'Lie to Me', whose job is to catch out people when they're lying. However, most of us are not as skilled as Cal, so we should be really careful before we accuse someone of lying.

Hi Jessie,
I'm writing this because my mobile is not working again. Please don't be 7.1 with me, but I borrowed your skirt – the flowery one. I know you can't 7.2 it when I take your clothes without asking, but I just have to look good tonight. I've got an interview for a summer job and I have to look 7.3 and formal. I'm really sorry but there was no way I could contact you.
See you later,
Chloe
